Try as much as we could, none of us ladies so dainty or precious or important or whatever, to give us up from the basic human need to visit the toilet. Sometimes we are in public when nature calls, which means public toilets are a necessary evil. I say evil because, well, often they're pretty nasty, but we have to. It is pleased that we collectively take some progressive steps in destroying the usual gender binary boundaries that unfairly discourage, marginalize and punish so many people based on their gender expression and identity. Gender-neutral public toilets are becoming an increasingly thing and it's super happy. No matter what exactly the door says, hoards of women continue to visit these public restrooms together, a trend that also continues to confuse men who are left shrugging their shoulders at a table or bar alone. Although left on their own devices and curious brains, men tend to develop theories about what exactly happens in a place to which they are never invited (OK, not usually, and if they are, it is safe to assume the business does not work as usual). I suppose I can put myself in dude shoes to understand how such a place can cause such intrigue- there is an extra chair in one toilet stalls. That leaves me, the actual conspirator in the phenomenon, still confused. Let's investigate because, well, sometimes they're right. What the guys think: We tell directly about our sexual interludes with them, doused with sincere enthusiasm. Yes, we knocked once. It was normal, I think. This can come up as a random share, humblebrag, or cautionary story, if it comes up at all. It's not that we don't talk about our sexual antics, but it rarely happens in the bathroom. If we have to talk about that stuff while we're with you, we seriously just text each other with you sitting next to us. No cold in Girtown.What guys think: We can't be alone for two seconds. The women's toilet line never takes two seconds. We just plan in advance so we can have a buddy chat with while waiting for our turn. This is true in places with poor check-in or spotty Wi-Fi. What the guys think: We have to pee. Well, of course, but it's also possible that the conversation at the table started to work a little stale so it seemed like a logical moment to break down. If enough of us bolt at once, it should also effectively put any good good or jokes on hold until we get back as a group. What guys think: We fix our makeup. There may be a bit of touching, but most likely we urinate, returning texts, checking our Tinder message to make sure we don't miss out on better options for the evening, or tweeting snarky comments about what's going on at the bar. What guys think: We make cocaine from the toilet. Mirror selfies (if the bathroom is empty. We would never do this shit with any actual people present). What guys think: We're talking trash about them. We're talking trash about them, but everyone else too. What the guys think: We're going to go out with each other. Sometimes, but hey, here's something strange: Regardless of sexual orientation, not many people actually find public restrooms super powerful twists. It's weird, isn't it? While most people think about birth control as the only ladies pill, some men take it too. What happens to guys when they take B.C. depends on whether they are cisgender men or transgender men. Share on PinterestFirst, you will need to consider this question: What is your reproductive anatomy? How birth control pills affect trans men, trans men opt out of lower surgery, which means they can still have ovaries, uterus and vagina. In this case, taking birth control can help control monthly flows and prevent pregnancy. What about transgender men on hormone therapy? Hormone therapy, which includes doses of testosterone, causes large changes in the bodies of trans men like deeper voice and facial hair. But that doesn't mean it's an effective replacement for birth control. According to an article by Dr. Madrie Deutsch, Director of Clinical Services at the UCSF Center of Excellence for Health Testosterone significantly reduces your ability to get pregnant, but it does not completely eliminate the risk of pregnancy. How birth control pills affect cis menFor cis men who do not have ovaries, uterus or vagina, appear B.C. tablets takes a variety of different You accidentally take hormonal birth control once or twice, don't worry. You probably won't experience any side effects. But if you take B.C. tablets consistently, estrogen consumption can tinker with your sex drive, reduce fertility, and even cause breast tissue growth. Human gender and sexuality are beautifully complex. It's easy to assume that men can't get pregnant, but that doesn't take into account transgender men who were assigned to women at birth. If you are a cisgender man - meaning you identify with the gender you were assigned at birth - it is physically impossible for you to get pregnant. But if you're a trans person involved in penis-in-wag activities, you run the risk of baby-making. Remember that even if testosterone hormone therapy reduces your chances of pregnancy, it can still occur. If you're a gender-mismatcherstering person or trans person, you should consider your birth control options. While many trans men are on birth control to avoid pregnancy, some men take pills to manage hormonal imbalances or stop getting periods. Cis men, sorry to break it to you, but estrogen- or progesterone-based birth control pills won't stop your swimmers from swimming. You're going to need a different kind of protection. Trans men, you're in luck. You can take birth control pills even if you are on hormone therapy. These two prescription medications should not cause any harmful drug interactions or side effects. Talk to your doctor to find out the best combination for you. You have options for men, you shouldn't take birth control pills, but you still have options. Condoms for quick fix and vasectomy for ... Forever. Trans males, you have different birth control options depending on what is best for your body: whether you are cis, trans, or nonbinary, it is always best to discuss your birth control options with your doctor. Are there any side effects? Are you sure. Literally, every form of birth control comes with potential side effects. Some people get crazy cramps with IUDs, some don't. Some peeps get bad bloating with B.C. pills, some don't. Each body reacts differently, so it can take time to figure out what works best for you. Oh, and ignore rumors that estrogen-based B.C. will abolish testosterone therapy's male powers. There's no evidence of that. If you are a trans person, you should be able to use both progesterone only or estrogen-based birth control to prevent pregnancy. Myth 1: A man cannot get pregnant because men do not have a uterus. Fact: Au contraire! Trans men who have been appointed at birth, men with uterus, ovaries, and vagina. Myth 2: Trans men cannot get pregnant if they take testosterone. Fact: Testosterone is not considered birth control. If you have ovaries and uterus, you can get prego. Womp womp. Just like cisgender women, trans men can get PMS, period breakouts, and irregular streams. Birth control pills can help alleviate these issues. For some trans men, getting a monthly period causes serious gender dysphoria. Even those on hormone therapy bleed from time to time If this bothers you, consider using birth control to stop the flow. Your optionsTalk to your doctor on what birth control methods will work for the specific symptoms you want to manage. For acne, your doctor may prescribe hormonal birth control pills, topical cream, antibiotics, or isotretinoin (Accutane). For severe periods, you may be prescribed certain types of hormonal birth control pills or hormonal IUDs. To stop your periods completely, your doctor may recommend a continuous dosage of birth control (aka skipping placebo pills), hormonal IUDs, or contraceptive implants or injections. Many trans men choose an injection or implant. Depending on your biology and medical issues, you might find relief without using birth control. It is rumored that estrogen-based birth control boosts female appearance. The truth is, it's just a rumor. Just taking birth control pills won't work. If you are someone designated male at birth who identifies as female or optional, you may be on the lookout for feminization treatments or medications. It's perfectly normal for transgender people looking out to do hormone therapy, but it's an attempt to be without medical oversight! Hormonal transition is complex.
